Rationale

This year's ECADOC theme will focus on investigating the role of "deep human" skills and career readiness. "Deep human" skills are advanced social emotional learning skills. Historically, these skills have been referred to as soft or non-cognitive skills. With the 4th Industrial Revolution replacing so many job sectors with technology, employers are recognizing that what cannot be replaced are interpersonal and complex communication skills, empathy, and leadership skills.

In this summer school, we will explore advanced social emotional learning skills as part of the environments that contribute to supporting students at different education levels, such as early childhood, secondary, and postsecondary education levels, and preparing them for the future labor market. We will discuss the projects that work to optimize youth educational and training opportunities, and the research methods used in investigating the project impact and examining youth experiences.

The design of this year's ECADOC Summer School was based on the work of Social and Emotional Learning International Research Network (SEL-IRN; officially recognized by the World Education Research Association) led by Drs. Lea Ferrari, Chong Park, and V. Scott Solberg. Since 2018, the SEL-IRN has been actively engaged in conducting research on the nature and value of Social and Emotional Learning in supporting youth future readiness by reflecting the voice of educators and valuing different perspectives across the Global South, Asia and the Global North. The network represents 20 countries around the globe that includes 35 researchers, ranging from seasoned to early career researchers to graduate students.
